ADJUTANT GENERAL CLAIMED BY DEATH

BRIG. GEN. WILLIAM W. MOORE PASSES AWAY

Popular Military Leader of State Ends Career of Service

The State, 17.

Brig. Gen. William Woodbury Moore, the adjutant general of South Carolina died at the Columbia hospital last night at 7 o'clock from diabetic trouble and an operation to remove a carbuncle from his neck. General Moore, although suffering from diabetes for a long time, had been in his office all last week and only Monday was forced to remain at home.

Yesterday morning attending physicians decided to carry the adjutant general to a Columbia hospital to operate for the carbuncle. The general went on the operating table about 1 o'clock, but never regained consciousness, dying shortly after 7 o'clock.

Word of the death of the military commander of the state spread over the city, especially among his intimate friends, and cast a deap shadow over many homes. General Moore was loved and admired by people all over the state, numbering his friends by the thousands. His death came as a distinct shock, even his office associates not realizing the serious condition the beloved National Guard commander was in until a short time before the end came.

It was the fate of General Moore to live just long enough to see the South Carolina National Guard reorganized since the war, his efforts again to place the militia on a sound footing in the state having just brought forth a complete regiment of infantry. Only Tuesday a colonel of the regiment was elected. . General Moore had worked untiring to rebuild the guard and just when he had succeeded he was removed from life.
